THE CHINA MAIL.

HONGKONG, TUESDAY, MARCH 19, 1878.

THE telegrams we publish in another column place the British Government in a more warlike attitude than it has apparently assumed throughout the Eastern crisis. It will facilitate an understanding of the present position of affairs if we review the telegraphic advice of the last few days. On the 13th instant we were informed that the Hungarian Delegation had agreed to the grant of 6,000,000 florins asked for by Count Andrássy. It should be explained that each of the two countries, Austria and Hungary, has its own parliament, ministers and government, the connecting ties between them consisting in the person of the hereditary sovereign, in a common army, navy, diplomacy, and in a controlling body known as the Delegations. The Delegations form a parliament of 120 members, one half of whom are chosen by and represent the legislature of Austria and the other half that of Hungary, the Upper House of each country returning 20 and the Lower House 40 delegates. On subjects affecting common affairs the Delegations have a decisive vote and their resolutions require neither the confirmation nor the approbation of the representative assemblies in which they have their source. It will thus be seen that the grant of 6,000,000 florins by the Hungarian Delegation still requires confirmation by the Austrian Delegation, but probably this step has been already taken, although we lack a telegraphic advice to that effect. The next paragraph in the telegram of the 13th stated that Russian troops were moving towards Constantinople, while "in the House of Commons the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated in reply to a question that the Government had received no information that the Russians were fortifying Bulair, and that they were still twelve miles from Constantinople." Whether this statement that the Russians were moving on the town of Constantinople itself was founded on fact remains yet to be seen, but the telegrams of to-day leave no doubt that the Russians were at least moving in the direction of Constantinople. Zedirekoi, the plateau commanding the Black Sea and the entrance to the Bosphorus, which the Russians are said to have occupied, is doubtless situated at the Black Sea entrance of the strait on the European side. Bojukkere, which the Russians are also reported to have approached, is a fortified elevation also on the European shore of the same strait, but nearer to Constantinople, being only about ten miles to the north of the capital. Should the Russians succeed in obtaining the command of the Bosphorus, and no Turkish men-of-war were looked into the Black Sea, they would in case of war be able to obtain supplies by water from Odessa, Sebastopol and other places, and thus be indifferent to the cutting of their land communications by Austrian, British, or Turkish forces. It would probably be a very difficult and bloody business to oust a Russian army from the Constantinople lines as long as they enjoyed communication by sea with their own country, but the Turks will be hardly foolish enough to withdraw the greater part of their fleet from the Black Sea while there is a possibility of the Bosphorus being closed by some sudden movement of the Russians. The Russians would, however, enjoy immense advantages in a struggle with Anglo-Austrian forces by a Turkish alliance, but as war between the Powers indicated would hold out a prospect of Turkey getting free from the consequences of her recent struggle with the Muscovite forces, and of seeing the Russian armies once more hurled back beyond the Danube, she is scarcely likely to favour the Russian cause much should other Powers undertake the task of freeing her from the Czar's clutches.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated the British Government had received no information that the Russians were fortifying Bulair, but the assertion in to-day's telegrams that the Russian troops near that place have been reinforced tends to show that if the British Government were ignorant of the erection of fortifications at Bulair such work was actually in progress. The concentration of Russian troops at Bulair is of about as much importance to the British Government at the present moment as the erection of Russian works there. To either operation the greatest significance will be attached. Bulair is a town dangerously near the Dardanelles and Gallipoli, and the British Government, whose fleet by the way still appears from to-day's telegrams to be lying at Gallipoli, at the Constantinople end of the Dardanelles, can only view a Russian advance in this direction with the greatest mistrust and suspicion. Bulair is situated on a rising ground apparently well adapted for defence, and the Russians may plead that they are erecting fortifications there merely to check any advance of the Turkish troops from Gallipoli on their flank or rear; but nothing is more likely to hasten the outbreak of a war than Russian movements in the neighbourhood of the Dardanelles. It seems now to be more than probable that if England is involved in a war over the Eastern Question she will not enter into the struggle alone; indeed unless the constant blockade of Russian ports, and the destruction of Russian commerce afloat, would ultimately induce the Czar to moderate his demands upon Turkey, England alone could scarcely expect to grapple successfully with Russia in the field. We believe England's military prowess is very much underrated by many who do not take the trouble to study statistics and the varied resources of the country, but we should regard any attempt made by England alone to thrust back the Russian invader in Turkey by a campaign in the field as a hopeless waste of blood and money. Exclusive of the volunteer force of about 170,000 men, there are in the United Kingdom at the present moment, leaving out of calculation troops serving abroad, fully 250,000 men thoroughly trained in arms, made up of regular troops, militia, and enrolled pensioners; probably we could also draw an Anglo-Indian army from India of about 100,000, but the proportion of these 350,000 we could place in the field, large as that proportion unquestionably would be in a case of absolute necessity, would be hardly able to dislodge the Russian legions from the strong positions they now hold in European Turkey; even with the aid of an efficient Turkish army.

A second inquest was held on the body of Lam Aman, before the same Jury. The evidence went to show that deceased met his death through the effects of injuries received by an explosion on board a junk. He was conveyed to the Tung Wah Hospital on Sunday last, and died to-day at 2 p.m. The Jury returned a verdict of accidental death.
